

Conclusion

Many solutions are local in nature and some are intra-jurisdictional, yet to be effective, they all need to be situated within a broad national strategy that provides clear delineation of responsibilities, sustainable funding mechanisms, and the tools for effective Integrated Water Resources Management. Developing a national strategy takes time, dedicated political will and financial resources. IWRM presents an opportunity to engage in meaningful dialogue that would allow all stakeholders, including the general public to consider the various options and tradeoffs and to build a sustainable water future.
